Excerpt: Clearly, this would be the most fitting way. As Zach prepares to cast away the only copy of his newly finished book, a hint of irony collides with rationale, not unlike the jarring force of a blunt rotten two-by-four striking the back of his head. Had creating been this easy since the beginning Only a month earlier, he had begun writing what he considered a running tab on lifes day-to-day discreetly disclosed secrets, but more importantly, desires. Now, the only copy of those captured realizations on the face of the planet lay in print beside him, the original file deleted from existence. Eyes fixated on the road, Zach continues down what is essentially barely more than a dirt path through the jungle, driving ever closer towards the sea. Perhaps it would seem somewhat more of a sorrowful event if it werent for the whirlwind of fanciful ideas that were contained in the three-hundred pages of what seemed more like a journal than a novel. As it were, there was nothing Zach wished for more than to finish the deed at hand and get back to the new life he had started. Recollecting on the memories of the recent events that glimmered in the front of Zachs mind, the jeep comes to a stop and he dismounts from the door-less vehicle. Walking towards the coastline, he carefully tightens the lid on what closely resembles an awkwardly over-sized Mason jar. Inside are the pages of a book, rolled into a cylinder shape, securely tied with a red silk ribbon. Also part of the jars contents is a handwritten note, which had been folded in half four times and tied...
