Thoughtful readers at times seek to put the idea of a paragraph into a topic of a few words and write this on the margin. The gains of a chapter are written out at the end. The inside back cover is sometimes used as a place for notes on what is read, what to go back to, and so on. The resolution to mark carefully makes one read with added attention. Summarizing requires concentration. The whole process, though it slows up progress, adds much to one s interest in a book. To reopen a marked book is like meeting an old friend. 3. Take Notes This requires reading at a table, with an armed chair, or at least with pencil and paper handy. Some men carry 3 x 5 paper in a small pocket book and make notes upon it for future filing and use. Surely a careful and thrifty reader will take notes, but there is a danger to be guarded against. In committing something to one.s notes for future use, the present impression is likely to be weakened. A deep present impression may be more valuable than a note. Do not let the taking of notes excuse you from careful immediate attention to what is read. One takes notes usually for one of four purposes: To file; to use before filing or without filing; as part of an abstract; for largest immediate practicability, as things to do. The...
