Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: .six, instead of four, and they ate more victuals than they washed clothes, and didn't know how to make starch nohow! When she were young, people washed clothes as they did their skin--wi their hands--and used plenty o water and soap, and bleached em on the grass till they were as white as a blossom. Mangles was mangles in those days, as you might roll the parson's lawn with, as well as his sheets, and not the fig-a-maree iron clothes-horses they was now! She driv off her washing as long s she could, and slopped out a few things in a pan, she did, but she were obliged to have a wash once a month, and she were to her wits ends then for sure! Just at this stage of her grumbles, while she was sitting in her old arm-chair, with a red earthen pan beside her, containing what were by courtesy called fine things, and which she was supposed to be washing. A tap at the cottage door announced a visitor. Now Grandmother Furbey, who was very precise, disliked exceedingly to be caught in her laundry attire--i.e., an old gown, drawn up through the pocket-holes, over her grey linsey skirt, with the sleeves rolled to the shoulders from her skinny arms, an old cap on, and a warm shawl to keep her chest safe from the steam; and to her further horror, who should catch her in this gear but Mrs. Evans, the...
